Famous Words of Famous Men.

"Corporations have no souls."---SIR EDWARD COKE, 1612

This memorable legal and a popular maxim grew most celebrated causes in the history of English out of one of the most celebrated causes in the history of English jurisprudence.

On June 22, 1611, King James L. citing an "act to confirm and to enable the erection and establishment of a hospital intended to be done by Thomas Sutton," by letters patent granted said Sutton a license "to found a hospital for the relief of poor and aged people and a free school" for the education of poor children.

A short time previous to receiving the royal "letters patent," or in 1611, Sutton had purchased the Howard House, as the Charter House (now one of London's most notable public schools), was then called, for £13,000. It was this old Charter House, once the home of the Carthusian monks, that the philantiropist des gned for his home for the aged as well as a school for the young.

But before anything further was done in the matter Thomas Sutton died.

In his will was a clause which provided £5,000 for "the huilding of other body politic." This decision in his will was a clause which provided $5.000 for "the building of mine intended hospital, chapple and school." Sutton dring without fully establishing his institution or without perfecting the corporation which should control it, a nephew, Simon fluxter by name, brought a suit for trespass against the then occupants.

of Charter House, by virtue of its purchase by Thomas Sutton, and also to set aside the bequest of £5,000 in the will.

Among the counsel for the plain-tiff was Francis Bacon, Lord Veru-lam, who after the adverse decision to the client suggested to the King that the whole Sutton estate, as he needed the money, might well be conveyed to him for his personal use.

The plaintiff contended, among other things, that there was no "incorporation" in the letters patent/of the King, and that, even admitting the incorporation, there was "no foundation" made by Sutton. The distinguished counsel, Lord Bacon, also maintained that "the place of every corporation should be made certain. For without a place or location, there cannot be any incorporation."

The arguments were heard by a bench of cleven justices in the exchequer chamber. Among those judges was Chief Justice Edward Coke, of the Court of Common Pleas, who gave the decision, and who sus-tained the will of Thomas Sutton as well as all of the decedent's trans-action: in reference to his intended lossital while in the life.

Also "it is not requisite," said Justice Coke, "that there always be truth in the name of the corporation either of a hospital or any other body politic." This decision likewise says, "a thing which is not in esse, but in apparent expectancy, is regarded in law," was need for a miss sarilest, vigorous and desperate right in order to be successful in eradicating the "white plague."

Dr. James Buchanan, secretary of the Associated Charities of Richmond, brought out the relation between his work and the work of the Tuberculosis Association by describing a case of a man treated at one of the disponsaries, and made to stop work and take a dozen raw eggs a day. The support of his family, the nourishing food with which the doctors must fight the inroads of the disease, and the worry and trouble to the man unable longer to earn a living were pictured. The question was shown from the viewpoint of a charity work to be not only one of medical treatment and careful nursing, but a practical proposition of eggs and milk and the support of a family in order to cure a hard-working and honest citizen. That all this would cost money, and lots of it, was not denice, but the argument was unanswerable, and a new phase of the right of the Tuberculosis Association was brought nome to the audience.

It is part of a builder's business to recognize, and avoid treaty with, men of straw: from them come the half of all builders' disasters. Old Crunden hated and abhorred men of straw, and he saw them now trooping up the new road in dozens. Any remaining hope must be in the solidity of guests invited by Dowling and Jack, or collected by the profuse advertising in the London press.

The luncheon, however, was most successful. Charles, the majod-domo: Drake, the caterer, and Jack, the wine steward and master of coremonles, all played their parts well. Jack particularly distinguished himself by his affability, winning all hearts, making everybody feel happy and at home. There were speeches and toastings. Mr. Douglas J. Griggs, at the top of one of the tables, gave a rousing oration; Mr. Crunden's health was drunk informally—without a speech—again and again.

The great sensation of the day was undoubtedly the Rosencrantz champague, It was truly dreadful stuffilke burning ice, like frozen hot punch, like sugar turned into gas—and its froth was quite wonderful. It made people sneeze. It foamed and fized and bubiled; it sent its corka nearly through the canvas roof. It banged like a gun, it gushed like a fountain, it steamed like a genyser. Crunden tossed off a very little of it and then drank tumblers of soda water, one after another, as fast as he could. But the men of straw loved it, could not have too much of it: "A glass of wine with you, Mr. Vincent." "Your health, sir." "Mr. Vincent." I look towards you."

Then a last, tables were cleared, tresties carried out; rostrum and lorty.
